The Story Behind the Photograph: Photos at the home of Sofia (wearing a red "hello kitty" shirt) and her family, Venezuelan migrants who are served by World Vision Colombia. Sofia and her brothers love to visit the nearby Child Friendly Space.

Mom – “We came here last year, September-October. We left Venezuela because of hunger. My baby and I were both malnourished, and I was trying to breastfeed. We crossed the bridge [from Venezuela] with a temporary pass. For the first few days we slept on the street near the bridge. Then we connected with some friends who live here [in El Talento] and we came here. We stayed with them for two weeks. That was too long; it was a strain on all of us. But they helped us find this place. We are grateful that the owner has let us stay here and take care of it for them. The situation for us is very hard here, but we are getting by. It's still better than in Venezuela.”

Dad – “I don't have the right permits to work, but I can sometimes pick up day labor jobs around here. I'd like to get the documents to work legally, so that we can have a steady income. I can do construction work.”

The children were in school in Venezuela, but they are not in school now.

“The Child Friendly Space is the best thing in my children's lives. I send them there to play. They make friends and they come home happy and singing. If they didn't have the CFS, they would have nothing to do. They love it.”

The Story Behind the Photograph: Rohingya refugee, Janatul, 5, loves attending the Child Friendly Space near her shelter in the refugee camp. She is the sole surviving child of Rohingya widow Salima. Janatul's name means "the best heaven."

SUMMARY: World Vision's Child Friendly Space in refugee Camp 13 in the city of Cox's Bazar, Bangladesh, is called Surjoful, or sunflower, and was named by the children who visit it every day.

- Farjana Faraz Tumpa, age 20, teaches children rhymes and the alphabet. Janatul, 5, is one of Farjana's favorites.
- "She is a bit different," says Farjana. "She attends the Child-Friendly Space every day. She concentrates on her studies. When I teach them something, she follows me carefully."
- Farjana respects Janatul's mother, Salima, a widow who lost her husband and two children: "She is a very good lady. Whenever we call a parents' meeting, she comes. She has only one child, so she is very careful with her."
- Salima is grateful for the Child-Friendly Space: "Janatul goes to the child-friendly space. It is important that she gets some kind of education." She loves the staff. "World Vision people are good and kind to us. For everything, I am grateful."
- On the children: "When they came, they had seen so many bad things in front of their eyes. They saw people killed. When they come here, they can forget those things. They can have fun. When they come here, they feel good. They are treated nicely. We don't scold them."
- She has hopes for Janatul's future. "As she has faced so much and lost her father, I hope she will be a good person and educated to do something for her family."

The Story Behind the Photograph

Doris has been with World Vision since 2004. She loves serving through this work and being in direct contact the children.

“I relish the opportunity to serve: the simple things that one can offer, like a smile, to be able to help with a word or just listen to the families that approach me. That's what motivates me - being in contact with children and families. To be able to help from what I have learned so far. Being able to serve them is my biggest motivation.”

The Story Behind the Photograph

Chen is an 11-year-old third grader and a World Vision sponsored child. Math is his favorite subject. World Vision has donated the school materias inside his classroom.

An average of 40-50 children attend a class in most of the rural schools in China. World Vision has enabled opportunities for quality learning, not just for Chen, but also for the rest of the children going to his school. They no longer have to worry about lack of supplies and about classrooms that were inconvenient and unsafe during bad weather.

The staff shared that parents in their community were made part of the activities, which allows them to learn and become aware of issues affecting their children, especially concerns around child protection. Parents are very active in their participation. Child sponsorship is a holistic program that involves everyone for the overall benefit of the community raising the child.
